What to Expect From the Housing Market in 2021

The Coronavirus pandemic led to some unexpected outcomes in the housing market. After a brief initial period of low activity in home sales, homebuyer activity vastly outweighed available homes throughout much of the U.S.

Now, with the promise of widespread access to COVID-19 vaccines... extended time at home is shaping how people live every day, as well as what they want from their home and where they want to live well beyond the the pandemic.

In 2021, here are a few trends shaping up for the housing market:

- Interest rates are expected to remain low but increase gradually.
- Average home prices will rise.
- Home inventory will remain low, despite plenty of new construction.
- Homebuyers will stay focused on the suburbs.

Here's what experts are predicting in 2021:

Home Buyers:

- Dense urban centers will continue to see less interest as many buyers flock to the suburbs and outlying areas for more space, affordability and options that aren't necessarily tied to an employer's location.
- If the economy remains stable, mortgage interest rates will likely tick back up over the course of the year while remaining low from a historical perspective.
 - Realtor.com predicts mortgage rates will end the year with an average around 3.4%.

Home Sellers:

- The expected increase in home prices may entice some owners to sell.
 - realtor.com predicts 2021 will yield an additional 5.7% increase in home prices by the end of the year.
- The market is expected to remain in favor of sellers throughout 2021 as inventory remains low.
- The continued desire to have extra rooms or nooks for at least semi-private remote work and school spaces will be a major focus, as well as outdoor space
